GLEDHILL GENEALOGY.

The name Gledhill is of Anglo-Saxon origin, derived from the words "glede", a variety of hawk or kite, and "hill", a hill. The name Gledhill means (as does Gladstone also) the hill or crag frequented by the gledes or kites.

In the old records the name was spelled in a multitude of variant ways, such as Glaydell, Gleadell, Gleadhill, Gleadill, Gledall, Gledehill, Gledehyll, Gledell, Gledhill, Gledhyll, Gledill, Gledyll, Gleidall, Gleidehyll, Gleydehill, Gleydehyll, Gleydell, Gleydhyll, Gleydill, Gleydyll, Gliedadall, Gliedall, Gliedhill, etc.

The immediate family of George Gledhill was located at Morley, a city near Leeds, Yorkshire, England. For centuries past there have been numerous Gledhill families located in Morley and other neighboring towns (Halifax, Horbury, etc.) in the West Riding of Yorkshire. The name appears frequently in the available published parish registers throughout a period of three or four hundred years, back to the beginning of the extant records (in some to 1538). Some of these Gledhills were of some consequence. To one of them, of Barkisland, Halifax, a coat of arms, described as "azure three lozenges in fess argent", was officially granted in 1612 and confirmed in 1632. Thomas and John Gledhill, Esquires, married into the family of William Horton, of Howroyde, near Halifax, which estate he purchased about 1639 (See Burke's Commoners and Landed Gentry, 1835). One Robert Gledhill, of Horbury, served in the Parliamentary army, had thirteen children, died 1703, and was buried at Tingley, near Morley. One of his sons, Samuel Gledhill, Esquire, born 1677, lieutenant-colonel of foot, and lieutenant-governor of Placentia, Newfoundland, 1719-1727, had a colorful career (for the memoirs of his life see E. R.

Yerburgh, Family history, 1912, page 127).

The available published records do not reveal the derivation from the early Gledhill families of the line of George Gledhill. The local land, probate, or other records in England might yield further information.

The earliest known ancestor of George Gledhill was William Gledhill.
